SELF-DESCRIPTION

I use video-based research methods to study organizational behavior. After recording the activities and practices of participants, I use digital technologies to carefully analyze the patterns and packaging of human interaction—discursive, material, and embodied—toward locating and explaining the behavioral bases for organizational successes and problems. This research informs my teaching and consulting: I teach graduate courses (MBA, PhD, EMBA) and executive education programs that feature video and audio excerpts of real behavior and events. I publish in top academic journals, receive awards for my research and teaching, and participate actively in the professional associations of my field.
